nearly spheric in outline, and is composed of three concentric coats: the sclerotic and cornea, the choroid and iris, and the retina. The sclerotic is an opaque, dense, white, fibrous membrane, into the anterior part of which the transparent cornea is fitted. The choroid is the vascular tunic, and is continuous with the iris in front. The latter is a circular membrane with a central perforation, the pupil. Within the choroid is the retina, a delicate, transparent membrane containing the terminations of the optic nerve.

The greater part of the eyeball is filled with a mucoid substance, the vitreous humor, against the anterior surface of which rests the crystalline lens. The space between the lens and the cornea is divided by the iris into two compartments, communicating through the pupillary opening, the anterior and posterior chambers, which contain the aqueous humor. Anteriorly the eye is covered by conjunctiva, posteriorly by a fibrous capsule (capsule of Tenon). The eyeball is moved by a series of muscles attached on the outer surface. Changes in the curvature of the lens are brought about by the ciliary muscle while the size of the pupil is modified by the action of dilator and constrictor fibers in the iris. E., Diagrammatic, of Listing, a scheme for simplifying optic prob-

Any substance which, in contact with another substance, is capable of setting up changes (fermentation) in the latter without itself undergoing much change. Ferments are classified into unorganized, or soluble, and organized, or living, ferments. According to the character of the fermentation, the unorganized ferments are divided into amylolytic, proteolytic, fat-decomposing, milk-curdling, and coagulating ferments. Amylolytic ferments (sugar-producing or diastatic ferments) convert starch into sugar. The most important is ptyalin of the saliva; but similar ferments are found in the pancreatic and intestinal juice, bile, blood, milk, urine, etc. Proteolytic ferments convert proteids into peptones and albumoses. They are found in the stomach (pepsin), in the pancreatic juice (trypsin), and elsewhere. A fat-decomposing ferment is found in the stomach and in the pancreatic juice. Milk-curdling ferment is found in the stomach and the intestinal juice. reactions which occur in the building up or pulling down of complex organic substances. The cell-equilibrium is supposed to be disturbed by injury to any of the physiologic atom-groups, as by a toxin, and this disturbance results in an effort at compensatory repair during which plastic material in excess of the amount required is generated and finds its way into the blood. This Ehrlich regards as the antitoxin which is capable of neutralizing the particular toxin to which it owes its origin, if this is subsequently introduced into the blood. In this theory a specific combining relation is assumed to exist between various toxic substances and the secondary atom-groups of certain cellular elements of the body. The atom-groups which, in accordance with this theory, combine with the toxin of any particular disease-germ Ehrlich calls the toxiphoric side-chain. I., Theory of, Emmerich and Löw's, based upon the conclusion that many bacteria generate enzymes capable of digesting the organism by which they were generated and sometimes other organisms as well. I., Theory of, Exhaustion Hypothesis, Pasteur's theory that immunity often afforded to the tissues by an attack of infection or following vaccination against infection is due to an abstraction from the tissues by the organism concerned in the primary attack of something necessary to the growth of the infecting organism. It is opposed to the retention theory of Chauveau. I., Theory of, Lateral Bond. See I., Theory of, Ehrlich's Side-chain. I., Theory of, Metchnikoff's Phagocytic. See under Metchnikoff.

Fever, a disease associated with the presence in the blood of Plasmodium malarie, and characterized by periodicity, enlargement of the spleen, and the presence in the blood, first of white, the red corpuscles, of parasitic plasmodia that exert a deleterious influence upon the red cells. The paroxysms may be intermittent, remittent, or irregular. If recurrent daily, the fever is designated quotidian; if on alternate days, tertian; if with an interval of two days, quartan. If two paroxysms occur daily, the fever is designated a double quotidian. There may be a tertian form, a paroxysm occurring daily, but only three or alternate days being alike, a double quartan form, and others. A typical malarial paroxysm consists of a cold stage, a hot stage, and a sweating stage, occurring in the sequence given. Intermittent fever is characterized by the occurrence of a complete intermission of the symptoms in the interval between two paroxysms, the temperature becoming normal or subnormal. In remittent fever there is only an amelioration of the symptoms in the intervals. In certain localities in which the malarial organisms are exceedingly numerous or intensely virulent the attack displays a pernicious tendency. Of this type there may be a cerebral form, characterized either by delirium and excitement or by coma and depression; a thoracic form, in which the respiration is accelerated and there is an urgent sense of the need of air; a gastrointestinal form, attended with nausea, vomiting, jaundice, and diarrhea; or an asthenic or algid form, in which there is a condition of marked debility with a striking coldness of the surface and of the breath. To the irregular manifestations of malarial poisoning, which do not at any time present the classic association of chill, fever, and sweat, the designation of "dumb ague" is given. The enlargement of the spleen in chronic malaria is sometimes designated "ague-spleen." Syn., Mursh-fever. M. A shining, silver-white, liquid, volatile metal, having a specific gravity of 13.55. The standard of capacity is the liter, a cubic volume of meter in each dimension. The standard of weight is the gram, the weight of 1000 liter (one cubic centimeter) of distilled water at its maximum density. As the unit of microscopic measurement the thousandth part of a millimeter has been adopted. It is called micromillimeter, or micron; its symbol is μ . In common practice, however, the following divisions only are used, the others being expressed in figures:

100	centimeters	=	1 meter.
1000	meters	=	1 kilometer.
1000	cubic centimeters	=	1 liter.

its surroundings depends. M. Tissue, the tissue of which muscles are composed; it is of two principal varieties—the striped, striated, or voluntary, and the unstriped, non-striated, or involuntary muscular tissue. The striped muscular tissue is composed of muscle-fibers, the unstriped of elongated, spindle-shaped cells. A muscle-fiber consists of sarcolemma, muscle-nuclei, and muscle-substance. The sarcolemma is an elastic, homogeneous, connective-tissue sheath which lightly invests the muscle-fiber. The nuclei are fusiform in shape, are situated immediately beneath the sarcolemma, and run parallel with the axis of the fiber. The muscle-fiber itself consists of two substances—a dark, doubly refracting, or anisotropic contractile substance, and a lighter, semifluid, isotropic substance termed sarcoplasm. The contractile substance consists of delicate spindles, the apposition of the thicker portions of which produces the dark transverse disc. The spindles terminate in minute beads, the juxtaposition of which gives rise to the intermediate disc or membrane of Krause. The neutral sarcoplasm fills out the spaces left between the spindles, and, as ordinarily the tapering ends of the spindles are too delicate to be seen, the space between the intermediate and transverse discs—the lateral disc—looks homogeneous. The contractile fibrils into which the contractile substance is divided, formed by the end-to-end union of the spindles, are aggregated into bundles—the muscle-columns—surrounded by a layer of sarcolemma. On transverse section these muscle-columns give rise to the appearance known as Cohnheim's fields. The muscle-fibers are held together by delicate areolar tissue the endomysium. Several grouped together form a primary bundle, which is surrounded by a sheath termed the perimysium. Fasciculi are aggregations of primary bundles, and are the units of which the complete muscle is composed, the latter being surrounded by the epimysium. M.-tone. N.s., Bulbous, amputation neuromas, round growths which form on the divided extremities of the nerves in the stumps left after amputation. N., Calorific, a nerve stimulation of which increases the heat of the parts to which it is distributed. The term is applied to the dilator nerves and to those stimulating functional activity of organs. N.-cell, a mass of protoplasm containing a large vesicular nucleus within which lies a well-marked nucleolus. Nerve-cells have one or more elongated processes, and in accordance with the number of these are designated unipolar, bipolar, or multipolar. The processes are of two kinds: the axis-cylinder process and the protoplasmic processes. The axis-cylinder (Deiters' process) either becomes an axis-cylinder of a nerve-fiber, or divides within the gray matter into delicate filaments.

it gives off minute branches termed collaterals; the other processes are supposed to have nutritive and conducting functions. N.-center, a group of ganglion-cells acting together in the performance of a function. N., Centrifugal. See N., Efferent. N., Centripetal. See N., Afferent. N.-corpuscles, nucleated corpuscles lying between the neurilemma and the medullary sheath of medullated nerve-fibers. N., Cranial, a nerve arising directly from the brain and making its exit through one of the foramina in the skull. N., Depressor, an afferent nerve, irritation of which depresses or inhibits the vasomotor center. N., Efferent, one carrying impulses from the central nervous system to the periphery. N.-endings, the terminations of nerves at the periphery or in the nerve-centers. N., Esodic, an afferent or centripetal nerve. N., Exodic, an efferent or centrifugal nerve. N. of Expression, the facial nerve. N.-fiber, a fiber having the property of conducting invisible or molecular waves of stimulation from one part of an organism to another, and so establishing physiologic continuity between such parts without the necessary passage of waves of contraction. There are two kinds of nerve-fibers: the medullated, or myelinic, and the nonmedullated, or amyelinic. A typical medullated fiber consists of the axis-cylinder, which may be surrounded by a sheath, the axilemma; the medullary sheath, or white substance of Schwann; the neurilemma, or sheath of Schwann. The axis-cylinder is made up of fine fibrils cemented together by a granular interstitial substance, the neuropilasm. The medullary sheath consists of a reticulated framework composed of a material resembling neurokeratin, and a semifluid substance filling the interstices, called myelin. At regular intervals the medullated sheath is marked by interruptions—the nodes of Ranvier. Each internode, as the portions of fiber included between two Ranvier's nodes are termed, possesses a nerve-corpuscle. The neurilemma, sheath of Schwann, or primitive sheath, is a delicate elastic membrane, closely investing the medullary substance. On its inner surface are placed the nerve-corpuscles. The non-medullated, pale, or Remak's fibers do not possess a medullary sheath, but consist only of axis-cylinder and neurilemma. The nerve-corpuscles are more abundant than in medullated nerve-fibers. Medullated nerve-fibers are found in the cerebrospinal nerves, while nonmedullated fibers occur in the sympathetic nerves and tend to form plexuses. Nerve-fibers are aggregated into fasciculi; these in turn unite to form nerve-trunks. The nerve-fibers in a fasciculus are held together by the endoneurium; while each fasciculus is surrounded by a sheath termed the perineurium. The epineurium holds together the several fasciculi composing a nerve-trunk. N., Frigorific, a sympathetic nerve stimulation of which causes a fall of temperature; the vasoconstrictor nerves are frigorific nerves. N.-grafting, the transplanting of a portion of healthy nerve from an animal to man, to reestablish the continuity of a divided nerve. Syn., Neuroplasty. N.-head, the optic disc or papilla. N., Inhibitory, one the stimulation of which inhibits or lessens the activity of an organ. N., Motor, one containing only or chiefly motor fibers. N.-papillas, papillas of the skin containing tactile corpuscles, nervous plexuses, or Krause's corpuscles and sometimes blood-vessels. N.-plexus, a grouping of nerves. N., Pressor, an afferent nerve, irritation of which stimulates the vasomotor center. N.-process, the axis-cylinder process of a neuron. N., Secretory, an efferent nerve, stimulation of which causes increased activity of the gland to which it is distributed. N., Sensory. Same as N., Afferent. N., Spinal, one of those arising from the spinal cord and making its exit through an intervertebral foramen. There are 31 pairs of spinal nerves. N.-storm, a sudden outburst or paroxysm of nervous disturbance. N.-stretching, mechanic elongation or tension of a nerve for the relief of neuralgia, spasmodic contraction, and other pathologic conditions. N., Sympathetic, one of a system of nerves distributed chiefly to the blood-vessels and to the viscera. See N., Vasomotor. N., Vasodilator. See N., Vasomotor. N., Vasomotor, any one of the nerves controlling the caliber of the blood-vessels; they are of two kinds—those stimulation of which causes contraction of the vessels—vasoconstrictor nerves—and those stimulation of which causes active dilation—vasodilator nerves. The other processes branch dichotomously, but also terminate in free extremities, they are known as protoplasmic processes or dendrites. In the gray matter of the brain and spinal cord the terminal processes of the neuron form a dense network, but not a communicating reticulum. Opium (o'-pe-um) [ῥῆνον, from ὄπός, juice]. The inspissated juice obtained by incising the unripe capsules of Papaver somniferum, of the order Papaveraceae, occurring in commerce in the form of brownish cakes having a narcotic odor and a bitter taste. Opium contains a large number of alkaloids, of which morphin is the most important, since it represents the chief properties of the drug. Other alkaloids are narcotin, $C_{20}H_{21}NO_7$, codein, $C_{18}H_{21}NO_5$, thebain or paramorphin, $C_{18}H_{21}NO_5$, papaverin, $C_{20}H_{21}NO_6$, norcein, $C_{23}H_{29}NO_8$, pseudomorphin, $C_{23}H_{29}N_2O_8$, and laudinin, $C_{30}H_{45}NO_4$. These bases occur in opium combined with meconic and thebalaic acids. According to the U. S. P., moist opium should contain not less than 9% of crystallized morphin. Opium acts as a narcotic, producing deep sleep, which, however, is often preceded by a stage of mental excitement and exhilaration; on awakening there may be headache, nausea, or vomiting. It slows the pulse and increases its force and raises blood-pressure; small doses do not depress the respiration, but large doses do so in a marked degree. It checks the motor activity of the stomach and intestine, and lessens all secretions except that of the skin; it produces contraction of the pupil. When taken in poisonous doses it causes unconquerable drowsiness, passing into deep sleep, with slow, full respiration, slow pulse, and contracted pupils; later cyanosis develops, the respiration becomes exceedingly slow, and the pulse rapid and feeble; death takes place from failure of the respiration. See Poisons, Table of. There is a chronic form of opium-poisoning produced by the habitual use of opium or morphin, and characterized by mental depression, a deterioration of the moral sense, and attacks of diarrhea. The drug is used for the relief of pain of all forms except that due to cerebral inflammation; in insomnia; in inflammation of serous membranes; in spasmodic conditions; in acute colds, for cough, retention of urine, vomiting, diarrhea, certain forms of dyspnea, particularly that from heart disease; and locally as an application to sprains and inflamed surfaces. There are marked lordosis and a peculiar gait, with wide separation of the legs and swaying of the body from side to side. The characteristic symptom is the manner in which the patient arises from the floor—he "climbs" up on his legs, on account of the weakened state of the extensor muscles of the back. They embrace the stomach, and, meeting again at the greater curvature, pass down in front of the small intestine, forming the greater omentum. They are then reflected upward as the transverse colon, which they encase, meeting again at the back of the colon and continuing to the spine as the transverse mesocolon. Here the two layers diverge: the upper extends in front of the pancreas to the under surface of the diaphragm, the staining part the lower layer is reflected from the front over the small intestine, as the mesentery. From the root of the mesentery it passes to the pelvis, invests the upper part of the rectum, and is thence reflected on the bladder, forming between the two the rectovesical pouch. In the woman it is reflected over the rectum to the upper part of the uterus and thence over the uterus, from which it proceeds to the bladder. From the bladder it passes up the anterior wall of the uterus

to the diaphragm. The following structures are completely invested by peritoneum: the stomach, liver, spleen, first portion of the duodenum, jejunum, ileum, transverse colon, sigmoid flexure, the upper part of the rectum and of the uterus, and the ovaries.

Galvanic stimulation of a nerve causes muscular contraction, which varies uniformly according as the kathode or the anode is applied, or as the current is closed or opened. Certain deviations from this law constitute the reaction of degeneration. The law may be briefly stated as follows:

Weak	C
Medium	C
Strong	Te	C	C	C

C, contraction; Te, tetanic contraction.

P.'s Law of Reflex Action. 1. If stimulation of a sensory nerve is followed by a unilateral reflex movement, the latter always occurs on the side to which the sensory nerve belongs. 2. If the stimulus received by a sensory nerve extends to motor nerves of the opposite side, contraction occurs only in the corresponding muscles. 3. If the contraction is unequal on the two sides, the stronger contraction always takes place on the side which is stimulated. 4. If the reflex excitement extends to other motor nerves, the direction of the impulse from the sensory to the motor nerve is from before backward in the brain and from below upward in the spinal cord—i. e., always in the direction of the oblongata.

The development is multiplication of the organism within the red corpuscles. In malaria fever the small intestine, spleen, liver, and gradually fill the entire body with pigmentation at the same time. The organism granules are formed from the blood corpuscles. When the organism have acquired a certain size, the granules begin to aggregate at the center of the body. At the time of the rupture of the organism becomes entirely encased in a most shaped. The granules are then breaking up of the organism into a mass of small spheres, each of which is a new plasmodium. The blood corpuscles are then the small free elements and are not the plasmodium. The plasmodium has been observed in the erythrocytes. These may occur in some forms, but are constant in material character. The plas-
